Display There’s no screen quality to compare here, but the practical equivalent is how well each mount helps you position your TV for the best viewing experience. Winner: Suptek. The Suptek MA001 is a full-motion bracket with tilt and swivel, plus a slim 36.8cm extension, so you can angle the TV toward the sofa, reduce glare from windows, and improve sightlines in awkward rooms. The VonHaus is a flat-to-wall mount, so once it’s up, the TV stays fixed. That is ideal for a neat cinema-style setup, but it gives you no flexibility if seating changes or light becomes an issue.

Performance Winner: Suptek. In mount terms, performance means how versatile and useful the bracket is day to day. The Suptek supports 26-70 inch TVs and up to 45kg, which is still plenty for most modern sets, and the full-motion arm gives you tilt and swivel adjustment after installation. That makes it much better for living rooms, kitchens, bedrooms, and open-plan spaces where the viewing angle is not always straight-on. The VonHaus supports a larger range of screen sizes, 37-85 inches, and a heavier 70kg load, but it performs one job only: holding the TV close to the wall. If you want adjustment, Suptek wins; if you want a fixed position, VonHaus is simpler but less capable.

Build quality and design Winner: VonHaus for strength and slimness; Suptek for mechanism flexibility. The VonHaus looks like the more confidence-inspiring heavy-duty mount on paper, with a 70kg capacity and max VESA of 600x400mm. It is also the more discreet option because its ultra-slim design sits flat to the wall, which is great if you want the TV to look as if it is floating. The Suptek is still solid at 45kg, and the brand has a much larger review base at 5,891 reviews versus VonHaus's 2,425, which suggests broad real-world use. However, moving arms add complexity, so there is more hardware involved and more potential for a less flush finish than a fixed mount.

Battery life Neither product uses batteries, so this category does not apply. If you meant installation convenience, the VonHaus has an edge for a straightforward fixed mount, while the Suptek's moving arm generally requires a bit more care during setup and alignment.

Price and value for money Winner: VonHaus. At £18.99, it is £9 cheaper than the Suptek at £27.99, and that is a meaningful saving for a budget TV setup. If your TV will stay in one position and you simply want a secure, low-profile wall mount, the VonHaus is excellent value because it gives you a larger size range, higher weight capacity, and a very low price. The Suptek costs more, but the extra money buys flexibility, which is only worth it if you will actually use the tilt/swivel function. For pure value, the VonHaus is the better bargain; for value in a tricky room, the Suptek can justify its higher price.

Game library/features Winner: Suptek. Again, there is no game library here, so the equivalent is feature set. The Suptek clearly wins because it includes pull-out full-motion articulation, tilt, and swivel, which are the headline features many buyers are paying for. The VonHaus keeps things simple with a spirit level included and a flat-to-wall design, which is useful, but it is not as feature-rich. If you want the mount to adapt to your room, the Suptek offers more useful features.

Overall user experience Winner: Tie, depending on room and use case, but with a practical lean toward VonHaus for most buyers. The VonHaus is the better choice for people who want a cheap, sturdy, no-fuss mount for a larger TV and a clean look. It is especially appealing if your seating is directly in front of the TV and you want the screen as close to the wall as possible. The Suptek delivers a better day-to-day experience in rooms where viewing angles change, or where you need to swing the TV out and back in. Its much larger review count also gives extra reassurance that it is a popular, proven option. Still, the VonHaus's bigger size support, higher weight rating, lower price, and simpler design make it the stronger all-round buy for most UK homes that just want a reliable wall mount without paying extra for movement they may never use.

Overall summary: choose the VonHaus if you want the best cheap fixed mount with strong specs and a minimalist look. Choose the Suptek if you need full-motion flexibility and are willing to pay more for better positioning. For most buyers who just want a solid, budget-friendly wall mount, VonHaus is the better buy.

Winner: a

The VonHaus wins because it delivers the better mix of price, strength, and simplicity. It is cheaper at £18.99, supports larger TVs up to 85 inches, and has a higher 70kg capacity than the Suptek's 45kg. If you do not need tilt or swivel, it is the smarter buy for a clean, secure UK TV setup.

Buy Product A If...

Buy Product A if you want the cheapest option and plan to keep your TV fixed in one position. It is also the better pick for larger TVs, heavier sets, or anyone who wants a neat, ultra-slim look close to the wall. If your seating is directly in front of the screen and glare is not a problem, you will get everything you need without paying extra for moving parts.

Buy Product B If...

Buy Product B if you need to angle the TV toward different seats, reduce glare, or use the mount in a room where the viewing position changes. The full-motion tilt and swivel make it much more practical for awkward layouts. It is also the better choice if you value flexibility over the absolute lowest price and want a mount with a very large review base behind it.
